ABSTRACT

Education for the common good lies at the heart of Catholic education across the world and is a vision shared by the United Nations. In Australia, education contributes to ensuring the nation's ongoing economic prosperity and social cohesion. It's not enough to hold a vision for education that contributes to the common good, we need to measure our success in this endeavour across all aspects of human flourishing, including academic development, physical and emotional wellbeing, and spirituality and outreach. This paper looks at some of the data available on measuring the impact of Australia education on the human development of young people and its contribution to the common good.
